Prior to becoming a physical therapist, Amy Kennedy, PT, DPT spent eighteen years in the marketing field. A life-altering event sent her down a different career path. Her husband of eight years passed away from prostate cancer. It was around this time that she was laid off from work. "I remember thinking that I wanted to do something different, something more. I wanted a career that meant giving back and making a difference in someone's life.

Amy completed the doctorate program in physical therapy at the University of Michigan–Flint in 2015. Her post-graduate focus has been on the use of manual therapy, and she credits the techniques she uses for her patients' results. "I've had patients with tears in their eyes telling me how much I have helped them. That means the world to me," stated Amy.

Amy's newest training is in Pelvic Floor Therapy. She is able to treat incontinence in women and is excited to help them live the life they deserve.

Several years ago, Amy underwent heart surgery. Because of this, she feels a special connection to heart patients and the elderly. She is able to identify and relate to what post-operative and heart condition patients go through. She knows, first-hand, how important it is to gain mobility and prevent the accumulation of scar tissue.

Amy is originally from Cupertino (Silicon Valley), California and moved to Michigan in 1999. Now remarried, she and her family live in Fenton. Amy is a practicing physical therapist out of our Hartland clinic. When she is not treating patients, you can find her at the local, boot camp gym working out or cheering on her two teenagers at their swim meets. She also loves to travel and hit the beach any chance she gets.

When you ask Amy what she likes about being a physical therapist, she will most likely say, "I like working with all the different types of people. It is so interesting to hear their stories and get to know them. I also like to see their reaction when they start to progress and get results. It gets them more motivated to continue, and it makes me glad I made the career change. I love what I do now."
